dawn is nothing but childhood protected by a very old cat like light under the door never the sky slower than in the water of a fountain where all the blue in the world is caught the fire of that time has begun and memory already looks like the reflection of a tree lost in the river

when we push the door open finally come out of the shadow stuck to our skin

we find under our feet the clarity needed to move forward the space is huge when the house is burning behind us when we’ve stopped gathering the ashes it’s then that the wind gives sky to the trees and we want to become ourselves wind sky and trees

it’s then that we want to become really become our actions become becoming visible at the end of our hands at the end of the elsewhere where life has already begun
